BUSINESS / BC GRADE 10 / 11

Customers & value

Identify who an idea serves and why it could help.

Entrepreneurship & Marketing 10 / Marketing & Promotion 11

01 Start with a specific customer

A target customer is a defined group with a need you can investigate. "Everyone" is usually too broad to guide product design or communication. Identify a situation, need, or shared constraint.

02 State a value proposition

Explain what you offer, who it helps, and why it is useful. Focus on the customer's task rather than unsupported promises. A feature is what a product has; a benefit is what that feature helps someone do.

03 Test before scaling

Use interviews, observation, or a small prototype to learn whether the need is real. Ask neutral questions about actual behaviour. A small convenience sample may give ideas but does not represent every potential customer.

Worked example

A school stationery kit

Target: students who often arrive without basic supplies. Offer: a low-cost kit sold near the school office. Test: ask students what they actually forgot last week, then trial a small batch. Avoid assuming that every student wants a kit.

Watch out: "Would you buy my amazing product?" is a leading question. Ask about real needs and alternatives instead.

Try it. Then check it.

Work through these questions before looking at the answers.

1. Make "students" a more specific audience for a study resource.

2. Separate a feature and a benefit for a downloadable study sheet.

3. Write one neutral interview question to test the need.

Answer key

1. Example: BC Grade 10 students reviewing slope before a class quiz. Other specific, realistic groups work too.

2. Feature: a two-page PDF with worked examples. Benefit: students can review the method offline and check their own work.

3. Example: What did you use the last time you were stuck on a slope question?

One-minute recap

Close the notes. Explain one key idea in your own words, then retry the question you found most difficult.
